Assassin's Creed 3&U:PLACEHOLDER Â .JAKARTA, Indonesia—The young father is weeping, but he doesn't sob. He's lost his father; he cries at funerals. Instead, the father is quietly reacting to the latest death of a mother and father like most young Indonesian men of his age, an acceptance of life's brutal truths. "Ourselves, we're just like dogs," said Chedi Setiawan, a 19-year-old welder from Banyumas, a village on the eastern flank of Indonesia's Sumatra island. "Men can't help being sad when their mom passes away, but for us men, the natural thing is to make fun of it." Indonesian women are supposed to cry when their parents die. But the last few weeks have seen a rise in violence against women here, and the men are sick of it. Amid a deeply disturbing video that circulated on Twitter earlier this week showing a relative of one of Indonesia's richest women being raped, a female lawmaker from the Indonesian Democratic Party of Struggle, a pillar of the Muslim-majority country's political establishment, was scolded on the airwaves for not crying when she revealed that her mother had died. The party's chairwoman called her a "housewife." The country is grappling with deeply embedded cultural issues that have long left many people living in Sumatra and Java deeply resentful of both men and women who have powerful social roles in traditional communities. A survey last month by the Indonesian Institute of Sciences
