"I'm used to dealing with those guys," he said. "They're looking out for us. They're looking out for the players. So it's a much easier situation than I thought it would be." The "much easier situation" talk is a little annoying when you come in with an established staff and your first two moves are to hire a new defensive coordinator, and then to fire the previous defensive coordinator. A little annoying, but not surprising. You can see Arrington is very pleased about the fact that he will be coaching with his son. He thinks his son's background will help him get this franchise over the hump in the near future. Meanwhile, Sashi Brown - the man who hired Arrington - knows how to win football games, because he's had to win them with his own players. He knows the value of a good defensive coordinator, as he's seen what Arrington has been able to do with a diverse group of defensive players. The staff Arrington has around him now might be a little like the staff when he took over for Gary Tranquill in 2009. You can see the young Michael Koenen's early impressions of the Bucs' staff in the person of offensive coordinator Mike Sullivan, who had been an assistant with the Buccaneers when they had Koenen in 1999. "I've watched him talk about Mike Sullivan as the offensive coordinator," Arrington said. "Mike's been an assistant coach with the Washington Redskins for the last four years. He had a great NFL career. He was a linebacker and he was as good a defensive lineman as you could be as a linebacker. He's definitely a quality guy. He knows the game of football inside and out." Arrington knew Sullivan when they were teammates with the Redskins in 1990. Arrington left the Redskins after that season, but he and Sullivan reconnected during the 1992 NFL strike. Sullivan ended up at Ohio State, where Arrington went, and they stayed in contact.
