EPLIKE V4.rar.Vaccines for nonhuman animals are widely used to prevent or mitigate diseases in animals. Vaccines are often administered to animals by injecting the animal with the vaccine directly or by use of a needle-like device. One type of vaccine often used in non-human animals are multivalent vaccines which may be administered to three or more animals at one time. The vaccine may be administered to the animals in a single dose or in multiple doses over a period of time. In many situations it is desirable to administer vaccines to animals in a manner that minimizes stress to the animal. For animals, such as, for example, horses or cattle, a small animal such as a dog or cat, or a bird, which are typically afraid of needles, or for less easily frightened animals, it is desirable to administer the vaccine to the animals in such a manner that the animals are not aware of the vaccine being administered. One approach to minimizing stress to an animal is to prepare a vaccine using a formulation that is less harsh to the animal. Such a formulation may include, for example, a saline solution. However, such a solution may not be suitable for administering an animal with a multivalent vaccine. In addition, even when an animal has no prior fear of needles, the animal may still experience stress from the pain and discomfort that is felt during the injection process. In some situations it may be desirable for administering a vaccine to an animal to administer a vaccine to the animal by using a minimal amount of force to cause the animal to move its limbs so that the needle may be successfully inserted in the animal. Accordingly, it would be desirable to provide an apparatus that minimizes stress to an animal that is to receive a vaccine that
